

Advance planning:

Honoring wishes.

While it can be difficult, talking with your loved one about their end-of-life wishes is an important step to take. Creating an advance directive provides your loved one the opportunity to express their medical, personal, emotional, social and spiritual wishes — and it conveys those wishes to family, friends and doctors. A comprehensive advanced directive answers these questions:

- Who should make your loved one's health care decisions if they can't speak for themselves?
- What kind of medical treatment does your loved one want?
- How comfortable does your loved one want to be?
- How does your loved one want to be treated by others?
- What does your loved one want others to know?

Having a conversation about your loved one's end-of-life wishes will help ensure that their final days are comfortable, calm and full of dignity.
